FACT PANEL

Muhammad ibn Uthman al-Amri

- His trade. An oil seller, like his father before him — the same market, the same cover, carried on rather than invented fresh.
- Who he served. Second of the four trusted agents (sufara') of Imam al-Mahdi, named to the post by his father, Uthman ibn Sa'id, before Uthman died.
- How long he held it. About forty years — the longest term of the four, by a wide margin, spanning most of the arrangement's whole seventy-year span.
- What came after. Before his own death, he named Husayn ibn Ruh as the third of the four, the same way his father had named him.
- Why he is in this envelope. Muhammad kept his father's post for about forty years, and never once let the family trade stop being the cover it was.

He died still holding the post, having named his successor himself.

Forty Years at the Same Stall

● is the grown-up · ○ is you · ●○ is together

- When Uthman the oil seller died, his son Muhammad inherited two things on the same afternoon. The stall in the market. And the work that ran underneath it.

○ What work?

- Carrying letters. His father had done it for two Imams, quietly, from behind a jar of oil, and Muhammad had grown up beside him learning exactly how without once being told what he was learning.

○ Did the market notice?

- Nothing to notice. Same stall, same family, same oil. The son stood where the father had stood and sold the same thing to the same people.

○ How long?

- About forty years.

○ Forty?

FORTY YEARS AT THE SAME STALL · CONTINUED

- Forty. He held it longer than the other three put together came close to. A boy born the year he started could be a grandfather before he finished, and in all that time the government looking for that family never once came up the road for him.

- Did nobody guess?

- Some did, the way they had suspected his father. But forty years is a long time to watch a man sell oil and never catch him at anything.

- What happened at the end?

- He did what his father had done. Before he died he named the next man out loud — Husayn ibn Ruh — so that nobody would have to guess, and nobody could claim it afterwards who had no business claiming it.

- Why say it out loud?

- Because a job that runs on trust dies the moment two men claim it at once. Naming your successor in public, while you are still alive to be argued with, is the only way to hand over something that has no office, no seal and no paperwork behind it.

- Could you keep one job for forty years? Say why or why not.

- Almost no work is tested that long. His was tested every year of it, by people scattered across an empire who would have paid badly for trusting the wrong man, and who had no way to check him except that he had never yet let them down.
