Hamida Khatun

- Who she was. Wife of Imam al-Sadiq and mother of Imam al-Kadhim.
- What she is remembered for. Being formally trusted by Imam al-Sadiq to teach matters of religion to women sent to her directly, rather than to him.
- What that shows. A recognised authority in her own right within the household, not only a caretaker of it — knowledge and care held together rather than kept separate.
- Her son. Raised in a household where his mother was known, publicly, as someone other women were sent to learn from.
- Why she is in this envelope. Hamida did not just raise Imam al-Kadhim — Imam al-Sadiq himself sent women to be taught by her.

She lived to see her son recognised as Imam after his father's death.

The Woman Other Women Were Sent To

• is the grown-up • ◦ is you • ●◦ is together

- Imam al-Sadiq had a wife called Hamida, and what he said about her tells you what he thought of her mind, not her housekeeping.

◦ What did he say?

- That she was trustworthy in matters of religion in a way almost nobody around him was. Then he did something that made the compliment mean something.

◦ What?

- He started sending people to her. Women came to that house with questions, and he sent them past himself, to Hamida, to be answered.

◦ Past the Imam?

- Past the Imam. People travelled from other cities to put their questions to him, waited their turn to do it, and he still said: not me, her. He gave away the one thing a teacher never gives away, which is being the person who answers.

◦ Why her?

THE WOMAN OTHER WOMEN WERE SENT TO • CONTINUED

- Some questions were easier for a woman to ask a woman. He knew it, and he trusted her answers enough that he never went back over them afterwards.

◦ Where was she from?

- The accounts disagree about nearly everything there except one thing: she was not from Medina. She had come a long way to be in that house, and she did not grow up inside the family she married into.

◦ Did that matter?

- It should have. It didn't. What she knew was what counted, and by the end the women of that city were being sent to somebody who had arrived there from somewhere else entirely.

◦ Was she busy?

- She was raising Musa at the same time — the boy who became Imam al-Kadhim. So he grew up small and underfoot in a house where women arrived at the door to learn from his mother, and that was just what an ordinary afternoon looked like to him.

◦ Who would you send someone to? Say a name.

- It has to be somebody whose answer you would not go back over afterwards. That is the whole test of it, and it makes a much shorter list than the people we say out loud that we trust.

Blocked: Text found and perfect — 'learn whatever you ignore and teach the ignorant your knowledge', in Imam al-Kadhim's commandment to Hisham. But that commandment is unnumbered prose in Tuhaf, and sourcing-rules.md forbids a citation without a number. al-Kafi vol. 1 hadith 13 carries a Hisham sermon but not this clause. Needs a numbered edition of the commandment, or a different saying.
