Uthman ibn Sa'id al-Amri

- His trade. An oil seller in Samarra and later Baghdad — a real trade, worked for real, that also happened to be a cover nobody thought twice about.
- Who he served. Trusted agent (wakil) to Imam al-Hadi, then to Imam al-Askari — carrying funds and messages between the Imam and a community that could not risk being seen visiting him directly.
- What came after. When Imam al-Askari died, Uthman became the first of the four men who carried messages for Imam al-Mahdi during the years that followed. First of four, and already decades into the same work when he started.
- Why he was chosen again and again. Not on reputation alone — each appointment came after years already served, watched and tested, under the Imam before.
- Why he is in this envelope. Uthman carried messages for three Imams in a row, ending with Imam al-Mahdi.

He died in Baghdad, still in the role, and named the next man himself before he did.

The Same Man, Three Times

● is the grown-up · ○ is you · ●○ is together

- He sold oil. That was the trade everyone in the market knew him by — jars lined up, a scale, the ordinary business of a man making a living in a city full of people making a living.

○ That's not much of a story.

- That was the point. Nobody watches an oil seller closely, and nobody remembers which afternoons he wasn't at his stall. Underneath the oil trade, for years, he was carrying something else: money collected from believers who could not travel, and messages, for a family the ruling government had spent decades trying to find and watch.

○ Which family?

- The family of the Imams. He did it first for Imam al-Hadi, riding out and back with nothing written down that could be read if he was stopped. When that Imam died, he kept doing it for the next one, Imam al-Askari. Two Imams, one lifetime, the same quiet work, unbroken.

○ Did people trust him?

THE SAME MAN, THREE TIMES · CONTINUED

- Many did, completely. Others were less sure — a man who keeps disappearing on unexplained errands draws questions eventually, however careful he is, and he had to live with that suspicion for years without ever explaining himself to clear it.

◦ Did he ever get caught?

- Not carrying anything that mattered. That is the whole skill of it — years of near misses that never became a story, because a near miss that becomes a story means somebody got hurt.

◦ What happened when the second Imam died?

- This is the part he is remembered for. Before he died, Imam al-Askari named him again — to carry messages now for his own son, hidden from almost everyone, in a house being watched more closely than either before it. A third Imam. The same man.

◦ Would you trust someone that much on one person's word? Name who, out loud.

- Nobody did, not on a word alone. Every choice like that gets tested for years, quietly, before it is ever made once and made public. That is exactly why the oil seller was still the one they picked, a third time running.
