Halima al-Sa'diyya

- Her role. A woman from the Banu Sa'd, one of several desert families who took in Makkan infants to nurse, in the custom of the time.
- The circumstances. Her own family was going through a particularly hard season when she took the Prophet in — poorer than most of the other families choosing that year.
- What she reported afterward. A marked change in her family's fortune — livestock, milk, and land all described as improving during the years he stayed with them.
- How long he stayed with her family. Several years, the ordinary length for the custom, before he was returned to his own family in Makkah.
- Why she is in this envelope. Halima nursed the Prophet as an infant in the desert, and her family's fortunes changed the whole time he was with them.

She remained connected to him in later life, and he continued to treat her with particular warmth.

The Desert Mother

● is the grown-up · ○ is you · ●○ is together

- It was the custom in Makkah at that time to send newborn babies out to families living in the desert, away from the city, to be nursed and raised there for their first few years.

○ Why send a baby away from home like that?

- The desert air was thought to be healthier for a small child, and the language purer, away from a crowded, busy city. Whole families made a modest living taking in babies exactly this way, every season.

○ Did families choose which baby to take?

- They did, every year, picking whichever babies seemed likely to bring the best payment or the best connections — an ordinary, practical arrangement for everyone involved.

○ Did anyone want to take the Prophet in?

- At first, not really, no. He had no father still living, which usually meant no payment worth the trouble to most families, and the ones choosing that particular year passed him over for babies with wealthier parents instead.

○ Who took him in, then, in the end?

- Halima, whose own family had almost nothing that year — a weak, thin camel, barely any milk to speak of, a hard season all around. She took him mostly because nobody else had, not because she expected very much from it.

◦ Did anything actually change after that?

- Everything, by her own later account of it. The camel gave milk again, the land itself seemed to give more, and the family's whole fortune quietly turned around during the exact years he stayed with them.

◦ Would you take on something nobody else wanted? Say why, out loud.

- Halima didn't know any of what was coming, not one part of it. She simply took in the baby nobody else in that whole group would.

nothing took the child nobody else wanted, and never once called that their hardest year again.
